Many scholars in Islam lauded the study of anatomy, primarily as a way of demonstrating the design and wisdom of God, and there are some references in medical writings to dissection, though to what extent these reflect actual practice is problematic.

Islamic Culture and the Medical Arts: Anatomy

The Qur'ān does not appear to endorse the kind of doctrine of a radical mind-body dualism found in Greek philosophy, Christianity, or Hinduism; indeed there is hardly a passage in the Qur'ān that says man is composed of two separate, let alone disparate substances, the body and the soul (even though later orthodox Islam, particularly ...
